He was very thin and very active, and probably some tweive smoky London summers had passed over his head.

I was a young and straggling doctor in the east end of London at the time, with hard work and poor patients, and my first introduction to the toy was on account of a flerce and deadly emity which had grown up between the youth who dusted my surgery and carried out my medicine and the ragged bne, who was known, by the way, as "Ginger Green"—an application which is not surely points to a love of color documnt in the breasts of the great unwashed, adverse criticisms notwithstanding.

washed, adverse criticisms notwithstanding.

This enunity terminated in what was, I betieve, locarly called a "scrap" outside my surgery door, in which my youthful assistant was severely manied. In addition to the injuries inflicted upon him his basket was knocked over in the scuffle and several bottles broken. I happened to return at the moment of the latter catastrophe, and seized "Ginger" by the collar and bore him insade, with the object of inflicting summary cuastisement. I had dragged him into the surgery and closed the door before he fully realized his position, and then he crouched on the floor buddled up in a heap, with one arm put up to shield his head.

Be was such a forlorn little figure and so very helpless that all thoughts of punishment vanished from my mind. I merely stood over him awaiting the turn of events.

"Garm" he exclaimed. "Who yer "ittin" of? I am't done nuffink."

"I think you have done a great deal my young friend." I ventured to suggest.

"What do you mean he berneline bettle.

"I think you have done a great deal my young friend," I ventured to suggest.

"What do you mean by breaking bottles and punching inoffensive errand boys?"

"I oddn't want to break no bottles, guv'nor. What's 'e want to go a givin' me 'is lip for, eli? 'Es siways at it."

"I regret that he should have offended your deep sensibilities," I replied, "but who is going to pay for the medicine?"

That question rendered him suddenly silent and stood there furtively glancing around the room and hopelessly thrusting his hands into one another of his ragged pockets.

"Wasitoruch guv'nor?" heasked, glancing up at me wistfully.

"More than you could pay," I replied.
"I suppose I had better send for a policenam."

The awful mature of the situation are

The awful nature of the situation appeared to fully dawn upon him. He cast one hungry—glance toward the closed door and another to the window, then drew his ragged sleeves across his eyes and began to cry.
"It warn't my fanit, guy'nor, sw'elp me, it warn't. I was a dobbin 'im on the kisser and never seed 'is bawaket, guy'- nor."

I restrained a sudden inclination to laughter, and spoke seriously.

"What's you name?"
"Green, guw nor; they call me Ginger."
"Well, Ginger." I replied, "are you aware wen, or are you ware that those bottles of medicine were for two people—three people, in fact—who are very seriously ill, and who are waiting for it?"
He became more solemn than ever.
"Oh, lor!" he exclaimed, in a breathless whisper, "will they pop it, guv'nor?"
"Pop* it" I echoed. "What do you mean?"

"Die-guv'nor-die."
"I think it's very likely." I said, as gravely as I could.

Futile Attempts of Husband and Wife

I looked in some wonderment at him; he was so desperately in earnest. But the end of the matter was that I made un the medicine affest, and, as my own boy was still dressing his wounds and anointing them with mandlin tears. I gave the bottles into the hands of Ginger, with many inward misgivings and many directions.

"Oh. I knows 'em!" he said, fistening cagerly. "Billy Collins lives in the buildings, I seed 'is nurver go in just now.

This ole gal," indicating another bottle—

" angs out up Angel court; this one lives in our 'ouse." "All right," I said. "But be quick."
"Right you are, guvnor." He urned at the door, and came back again. "Aln't I to

"Certainly not; it's all put up on the bottles—on the labels. And come back here when you have delivered them, so that I may know that you have left them properly. Do you understand?" He seemed doubtful for a moment, but numediately nodded his head, and was out of the door like a flash, and I saw him from outside to hear the result of his capture. In an incredibly short space of time he was back again. He passed his late enemy, who opened the door, with lordly indifference, and marched straight into the surgery.

"I done it, guv-nor," he said breathlessly. "Billy Collins' muyer thought I was a guyin' 'er, but I told 'er to 'old 'is nose, an

"I didn't ask you to give instructions to Mrs. Collins, or to any one else," I said, severely. "Are you sure you gave the people the proper bottles?"

"Course, I did, guv'nor. Can't I read?" he replied, scornfully. "But yer does write a queer fist, yer wouldn't pass the third standard."

I saw a great deal of Ginger Green after

I saw a great deal of Ginger Green after that, and the more I saw of him the more I liked him. I had thoughts of taking him into my service, in some capacity, but he was in every way too erratic. I discovered, from casual questioning, that he gained something of a livelihood by selling newspapers and matches; that his mother went out "charing," and that his father was an authority, by reason of long experience, on the liquor question.

I engaged him once to run errands for me, and provided him with some decent cioth-ing, but he was missing for several days afterward, and when he returned he wore his old clothes.

In explanation, he informed me that "far-ver 'ad shoved 'em up the spout," and men-tioned an establishment near at hand over whose door way hunt three brass bails. Aftioned an establishment near at hand over whose doorway hung three brass bails. Af-ter that I gave up the attempt. I suppose it happens to all men at some time or other of their lives, no matter what their poverty or the greenness of their struggle for existence may be, to fall in love. I know that it happened to man love. I know that it happened to me at that time, even in the midst of the busy life I led-perhaps by very reason of it. I know that I am grateful, in this latter time, for the love that came to me then
